"Religious Petitions" by Baptists, Presbyterians and Others.

ON EXHIBITION IN THE STATE LIBRARY

Story of Their Origin and How the Long Contest Against the "Establishment" Was Carried On by the Earnest "Dis-senters."

A collection of especially interesting and important manuscripts will be put on exhibition in the portrait gallery of the State Library this week by the Department of Archives and History. This collection is that of "religious petitions," which were presented to the General Assembly during the momentous years of the Revolution and the years succeeding. These documents will be so arranged, with accompanying cards, that the progress of the struggle which ended in complete religious freedom may be studied from beginning to end. A number of these religious petitions will be included among the State Library's exhibit at the Jamestown Exposition.

Interesting as the history of the overthrow of established religion in Virginia is, the majority of people are ignorant of it. The story of this struggle is told in these petitions with a fulsome seldom found, and consequently the collection will have a more than usual interest for those who know the history of the State. In fact the religious petitions are the only source for certain phases of the religious conflict in Virginia, and are the first time that they have been exhibited.

Origin of Petitions. For a proper understanding of their value, it is necessary to know something of the conditions which produced them and the grievances which they endeavored to remedy. It is difficult for us, with our acquaintance with the present condition of things in Virginia, spiritual and temporal, to appreciate the conditions existing in the State at the beginning of the Revolution.

There was an established church in Virginia—the Church of England. The people were required to attend its services, and were taxed for its support. In return the people received the services of a somewhat inferior clergy, which was established as before unlearned, uneducated and generally acquainted with the world, the flesh and the devil. The clergy were not only uneducated, but they were also unprincipled, and in the first time that they have been exhibited.

At all events, things religious were out of joint in Virginia for some years prior to the Revolution. The spirit of rebellion against authority was not only rampant in the Colony, and applied to religion as well as to politics. The established church, Church of England in Virginia, became unpopular with many people, because of its connection with royal authority, the character of its clergy, and the fact that because of the taxes levied for its maintenance. The local tyranny exercised by many vestries in church matters did not enhance the popularity of the Establishment. Indeed, some writers attribute the independence of the established church to its lack of ecclesiastical control and the corresponding power of the vestries. The church, they say, was not Episcopal.

Wonderful Awakening. Popular discontent with the church found expression in the celebrated "Pamphlet Cause" of 1774, when the young people of the colony began to publish and circulate pamphlets. The clergy of some parishes attempted to collect their tithes of tobacco, and by the law at that time, at a time when tobacco was king, the law was appealed to the persons were legally right, but Henry's tongue confounded them.

At this time, in Virginia for the growth of active dissent. The means of growth were supplied by one of those religious movements which have so often convulsed the British people. This was the great revival of the Westons, Whites and Edwards. The conception of religion as a conscious and intimate relationship between the soul and God was preached as never before, and awoke the slumbering religious instincts of the English-speaking people.

The Presbyterians were the first dissenters to enter Virginia as a sect. They were chiefly Scotch-Irish, of the West, and they did not at once effect Eastern Virginia. But some years before the Revolution the Presbyterians began to make headway in Hanover and the adjoining counties, and presently Baptists, Quakers, Methodists and others entered the State and propagated their doctrines. The Baptists especially grew rapidly and disturbed the conventional and unemotional Virginia of the eighteenth century to its depths.

Indeed, the effects of burning evangelism, Christianity, preached crudely, but with utmost sincerity, were marvelous. The old Virginia of that day was full of dull and sleepy sects, and the new, delivered unhesitatingly to the back of the neck and powdered dignity, into this drowsy land the itinerant exhorters dashed and vividly painted heaven and hell, disturbing the peace of mind of the whole community.

Persecution Followed. The first case of imprisonment seems to have taken place in Fredericksburg in 1778. John Waller, Lewis Craig, James Childs and others were hauled up before three magistrates, who offered to release them if they would promise to spare the county their sermons for a year and a day. They refused, and were marched to jail, singing as they went through the streets. "Bread and water, bread and water," some of the natives believe that the curse of this persecution stopped the growth of the town for a hundred years.

A number of similar cases of imprisonment followed, and legal persecution was sometimes accompanied by mob violence, as the powerful emotions awakened by the religious revival antagonized those whom it did not attract. Persecution, as is sometimes the case, but not always, aided the growth of the persecuted sect. The Baptists increased in numbers, and the Presbyterians, while many Quakers and other sectarians came into the State from the North.

It was now the beginning of the Revolution. The chief questions that strained the relations between king and colonies were political, and religious matters might not necessarily have entered into the conflict to a great extent. This was certainly the preference of the majority of the leading patriots, who were churchmen while they were rebels. But revolutions sometimes accomplish more than they aim at. The dissenters, now largely outnumbering the churchmen, were determined that religious as well as political liberty should be secured, and the dissenters had the sympathy of some of the strongest men of the day.

A political motive for assisting the dissenters lay in the fact that the State would need their warm support in the coming struggle. To men as broad as Jefferson, Madison and Mason, the occasion called for the general assertion of liberal principles. When the convention met at the House of Burgesses, the dissenters began to send in petitions, and it was by petitions attacking or defending the Established Church that the struggle was chiefly waged.

The Baptists, in a petition dated August 14, 1775, expressed sympathy for the Baptist and Presbyterian Onslaught.

This article was adopted June 12, 1776, and, on June 20, the Baptists attacked the Establishment in a petition asking that they be allowed to maintain their ministers and enjoy the ministrations of these, without the necessity of supporting the clergy of "other denominations" meaning, of course, the clergy of the Establishment.

The first General Assembly of Virginia met in October, 1775. The attack on the Establishment then became general, and many petitions, chiefly from the Presbyterians, poured in upon the Legislature. The Presbyterian of Hanover asked for the repeal of laws containing religious denominations and enforcing taxation for their benefit. One immense petition, signed by 10,000 names, and many yards in length, attested to the number and unanimity of the dissenters.

The Assembly bowed before the public will, and passed a law on December 3, 1776, exempting dissenters from the support of the church of which they were members, and after a severe struggle in which Pendleton and Nicholas led the conservatives.

Dissenters were relieved of the burden of supporting the Establishment with their taxes, but the question of State interference in religious matters was not yet settled. It was still a debated question whether there should be taxation for ecclesiastical purposes. Meanwhile, the opponents of the Establishment secured a postponement of the payment to it of any taxes at all. This condition of affairs lasted through the years 1776-1779, in which time a number of petitions were presented, asking for the overthrow of the Establishment, or opposing the system of church taxation, which was called assessment.

Jefferson's Act Held Up.

In the session of 1779 the opponents of the Established Church made a determined assault upon it. The bill for stripping it seriously, although they were not able to secure their full demands. Taxation for the benefit of the clergy of the Establishment had been suspended for three years. The opponents of the Establishment were now asked for the support of the clergy were repealed. It now became impossible for the old Establishment to hope for an exclusive benefit from taxation, although the question of taxation itself still remained undecided.

The settlement of the latter could have been accomplished by the passage of Jefferson's "Act for Establishing Religious Freedom." The bill for religious freedom was reported in the House of Delegates in June, 1779. It was held up, the enemy being too strong. The act, as finally passed, reads: "Be it enacted by the General Assembly, That no man shall be compelled, to frequent or support any religious worship, place or ministry whatsoever, nor shall he be enforced, restrained, molested or burthened in his body or goods, nor shall otherwise suffer on account of his religious opinions or belief, but that all men shall be free to profess and by argument to maintain their opinions in matters of religion, and that the same shall in no way diminish, enlarge or affect their civil capacities."

The bill was not passed, however, at this session and for a number of sessions to come. The bill did not pass for several reasons. The State was deeply involved in 1780-81 in the progress of the war. After the establishment of peace in 1782, the old church, which had been paralyzed by the war, began to show signs of reviving. A plan was brought forward to secure the property of the church by the church by means of an act of incorporation, and to provide for the support of the clergy by a system of general taxation of all the citizens of the State for the benefit of the various churches.

This law would give each person the right to choose the church which should receive his tax. In this way the Presbyterians, Baptists and Methodists, if they considered themselves separate and other sects would be established, as well as the Protestant Episcopal Church, which was the successor and heir of the old Establishment.

Several Makeshifts.

The plan was formidable through its leading advocates, who were none other than Patrick Henry, Time and Reasonability had cooled the once ardent radical and he had become the maintainer instead of the upholder of systems. A number of Presbyterians, and perhaps some other dissenters, were in favor of this plan, which would have been the merit of making preaching a somewhat less precarious profession than it was.

A large part of the Assembly was Episcopal. It was accordingly possible to do something for the favored old church. Accordingly, a law was passed in 1784 providing for the incorporation of the Episcopal Church. By this law vestries of a certain income; they might indulge in lawsuits or be sued, and (principally) they might hold the glebes and other church property formerly belonging to the Episcopal Church as their own. This act was followed in December, 1784, by "A bill establishing a provision for the teachers of the Christian religion." The bill was intended to plan for the general support of religion and religious sects by means of taxation.

It was true that this bill gave the same right to all sects, which called themselves Christians, to form their own churches, and to have their own ministers. It was largely inclusive. It was not, however, in the line of religious freedom, and small consolation would the irregular tax-payers have found in the privilege of choosing a destination for their willingly paid taxes. Immediately the war of petitions was renewed as never before, and from almost every county of the State came demands for the plan or fervent appeals for its support.

Madison to the Rescue.

James Madison was the leader in the fight against incorporation and assessment. He put forth his famous "Remonstrance," which at once had great effect. The balance of the Assembly was decidedly against the taxation plan. The Presbyterians, who had in some instances favored assessment, now closed up solidly against it, and the Baptists, who had formerly been in the middle, had stood by it through their disaffection. The bill passed the House on December 17, 1785, and put an end to all plans of church establishment, general or particular.

But the Episcopal Church was still incorporated, and the other religious sects sent in petitions after petitions opposing it, and signed apparently by nearly all the inhabitants of the State. As long as the church continued incorporated, its title to the old glebes and other property handed down to it remained good. The Legislature boxed again before what was plainly the popular will, and in 1786 repealed the incorporating act. The glebes continued to remain in the hands of the vestries, where there were any vestries, but they were held by a very uncertain tenure.

It was the object of the Baptists to change this uncertain possession into a certain disposssession. The principle of republican equality was on their side.

From 1786 until the end of the century the Baptists and possibly other dissenters continually put in petitions for the sale of the glebes and the appropriation of the proceeds for other purposes than the support of religious denominations. Carthage set the lead.

The Episcopalians struggled pathetically against the loss of this last privilege, which appealed to them as an absolute right. "That converting their society bath under laws passed more than a century previous to the Revolution," said one of these petitions, dated 1786, "the same right to their glebes and other property has been vested during the royal government, they have continued to hold and use them for their appropriated purposes; in all other respects considering themselves in a state of perfect equality with their brethren of other sects, and ardently wishing to live in peace and harmony, and the intercession of benevolence and charity with all." This was a strong plea, but the opponents of Episcopal glebes were able to put forth the

The supporters of ecclesiastical establishments and taxation had argued that the withdrawal of all State support from religion would mean the overthrow of religion; that religion in this world or earth could stand alone. Dissenters protested with a reminder of the friendliness and healthy condition of the present church. In the early years of the nineteenth century the dissenters seemed to have the best of the argument, for religion was in a sad state of decline. This came about, however, from other causes than disestablishment. It was chiefly due to the intense heat by war and upheaval, and to the propagation of "French principles" in the State. Virginia became full of skepticism and atheism. Curiously enough, skepticism and atheism flourished as a green bay tree and withered, for before many years had passed there was a great and general revival of religion in the old commonwealth, and the French influence lingered only as a memory.

All Virginians should see the "Religious Petitions" that will be placed on exhibition in the portrait gallery of the State Library this week. They eloquently tell the long story of the most remarkable contest this country has ever known.
